Chapter 1 by Kim Pines

A girl awakens in a field. Her name is Nishi Adachi. However, she is unaware of this. Nishi has awoken in this strange field with no recollection of her identity. Confused, the girl arose, and looks around. There did not appear to be anything for miles upon miles. Even more confusing. She decided that it was in her best interest to head off in a random direction. Either she ends up even more lost, or finds something, anything at all. It was a 50/50 chance, and Nishi had decided even that was better than remaining in place doing nothing in confusion. So she headed off to what she assumed was the East. She couldn't recall how to actually tell direction, so she just assumed it was the East, which comforted her, realizing that she at least had a direction, albeit likely a false one.

As Nishi walked, she attempted to recall what she had forgotten. She had no idea how she had gotten to where she had woken up, but more importantly, she could not recall who she was. She could recall a great deal of words and their meanings, which made her fairly happy, as at least she didn't have to relearn those. But the lack of self identity was going to be terrible. She recalled the words friend and family, yet she could not recall if she had any. Nishi came to the conclusion that she did have friends and family, and they were all worried about her. Once again she couldn't actually remember if this were true, but it made it far less stressful. Although, to think she could potentially be wrong was mildly terrifying to say the least.

The one thing Nishi managed to recall from whatever life she had lived prior to this moment, was that she had a cat. She had no idea why this one oddly specific detail stuck with her. She couldn't even remember her own name, yet she could recall owning a cat. If anything this was one of the most upsetting parts of this sudden memory loss. Nishi eventually got over it though.

closer, she realized it was a town. An empty town, but a town nonetheless. Her gamble had paid off.

As she approached the town, she noticed something a bit odd.
